Sell (sel), v. Pa. t. and pa. pple. sold (səld). Forms: see below. [A Com. Teut. wk. verb: OE. sellan, pa. t. sealde, pa. pple. sælde, corresponds to OFris. sell to give, sell, OS. sellian to give, pa. pple. gisald (MLG., LG. sellen to sell by retail, huckster; hence in Ger. dialects), OHG. sellen to deliver up, pa. t. saltā, pa. pple. kasalt, giselit (MHG. sellen), ON. selja to give up, sell, pa. t. selda, pa. pple. seld (Sw. sälja, Da. sælge to sell), Goth. saljan to offer (sacrifice) — O'Ent. saljan*, f. salū gift, delivery, SALE sb.

It has been suggested by Osthoff that O'Ent. sal* (=pre-Teut. sal*) may be an ablutative variant, with causative sense, of sel* to take (Irish selaim, Gr. ἐλαίω).

The difference of vowel between the pa. t. and the pa. p. salidā, salid fore has no unlaunt except in the pres. stem. Cf. TELL v.

The OE. form (sellian* syllan (beside the normal sellan: cf. syllan TELL v.) is difficult to account for, as the breaking before ll otherwise occurs only when the gemination is of O'Ent. date. Possibly the syllant may in some way have affected the following vowel.]

2. The Greek version of the Old Testament, which derives its name from the story that it was made by seventy-two Palestinian Jews at the request of Ptolemy Philadelphus (284-247 B.C.) and completed by them, in seclusion on the island of Pharos, in seventy-two days. (Denoted by LXX.)

The authority for the old story is the Letter of Aristes to Philocrates, long known to be spurious, which purports to give contemporary evidence of the undertaking. The translation is now held to have been made by Egyptian Jews, independent of each other and living in different times.

seraphim. [a. late L. seraphim (Vulg.), in MSS. often seraphim (= Gr. σεραφίμ, σεραφίμ, LXX.), a. Heb. שֶׁרָפִּים śrāphīm (only in Isa. vi), pl. of שֶׁרָפָן śrāphān, which is not recorded in the Bible, unless it be identical with the formally coincident word denoting a kind of venomous serpent, which occurs as quasi-adj. or in apposition with naḥāsh serpent in Num. xxi. and Deut. viii. (Eng. Bible 'fiery serpents', after Vulg. ignitos serpentes, serpens adurens; LXX ὄφεις θανατοῦντας, ὄφεις δάκνους), and in Isa. xiv. 29 and xxx. 6 with the epithet 'flying' (Eng. Bible 'fiery flying serpent').

Some scholars assume the identity of the word occurring in Isa. vi. with that found in the other passages. On this view the 'seraphim' seen by Isaiah flying above the throne of God represent a mythic or symbolic conception which must originally have had the form of a 'fiery flying serpent', though in the vision this appears considerably modified. The word śrāphān, as the name of a kind of serpent, may belong to the root śrāph to burn, in allusion to the effect of the bite (cf. Gr. σφαιρίδιον). This etymology has given rise to a conjecture that the celestial 'seraphim' originally symbolized the lightning. Of those who reject the identity of śrāphān 'seraph' with śrāphān 'fiery serpent', some refer the former to the root of the Arabic sharafa to be lofty or illustrious. Phonologically this is unobjectionable, but on other grounds it is now generally abandoned. Various suggestions of non-Hebrew (Egyptian, Assyrian, etc.) etycoincides with the Aramaic śrāphīm, but it is very doubtful whether it is more than a scribal error or a euphonic alteration. Cf. f. seraphin (Seraphin, 12th c.), f. serafi, Sp. serafin, Fr. seraphim, It. serafino (all masc. sing.). In the Latin liturgical passages from which the word first became widely known, it was prob. originally apprehended correctly as a plural, and readers of the Latin Bible would be guided aright by the syntax of Isa. vi. 2; but there is evidence that 'Cherubim and Seraphim' were often supposed to be the names of two individual angels. From the 15th to the 18th c. the English plural ending was often -im, as in the 16th c. (the form -im = 'one of the seraphim' in the 17th c.). After the introduction (perh. by Milton) of the form SERAPH, the misuse of the plural forms in singular sense gradually became rare, and it is now obsolete.]

1. In Biblical use: The living creatures with six wings, hands and feet, and a (presumably) human voice, seen in Isaiah's vision as hovering above the throne of God.

1382 WELSH Isa. vi. 2 Serafyn stoden up oo it. [1535 (Coverdale), 1537, 1539, 1551 the Seraphims; 1540 Seraphims; 1560 (Geneva), 1611 the Seraphims; 1568, 1609 (Douay) Seraphims; 1884 (Revised) the seraphim.]

2. By Christian interpreters the seraphim were from an early period supposed to be a class of angels, and the name, associated with that of the cherubim, was introduced in the Eucharistic preface and subsequently in the Te Deum, and thus became extensively known. The presumed derivation of the word from a Heb. root meaning 'to burn' (see above) led to the view that the seraphim are specially distinguished by fervour of love (while the cherubim excel in knowledge), and to the symbolic use of red as the colour appropriate to the seraphim in artistic representations. In the system of the Pseudo-Dionysius, the chief source of later angelology, the seraphim are the highest, and the cherubim the second, of the nine orders of angels.

Not in Johnson. Todd 1818 has 'Serf, a slave. Not in use' with quot. from Hume 1761 (see 2 b).

† 1. A slave, bondman. Also fig. Obs.

1483 Cromwell's Letters 1. 100 'I am a serf'... of thys. 1614 24 to a 30 thou aughtest to be put under a serf or bonde man.

2. A person in a condition of servitude or modified slavery, distinguished from what is properly called 'slavery' in that the services due to the master, and his power of disposal of his 'serf', are more or less limited by law or custom.

In most of the typical examples of serfdom, the serf was 'attached to the soil' (adscriptus glebe), i. e. he could not be removed (except by manumission) from the lord's land, and was transferred with it when it passed to another owner. This feature is often assigned as the distinctive mark of 'serfdom' as opposed to 'slavery', and is popularly apprehended as an essential part of the notion.

a. In the 17-18th c. used (after Fr. example) with reference to the contemporary condition of the lower class of cultivators of the soil in various countries of Europe, esp. in parts of Germany, in Denmark, Poland, and Russia. Now used Hist. with the same application; chiefly with reference to Russia, where the serfs were not emancipated until 1861, while elsewhere in Europe serfdom ceased to exist early in the 19th century.

As for Serfes, Slaves or Villaines, they are Domesticke, and serue vpon baser condition, for Wages and Victuals. 1614 76 Neither the Subject nor the Serf are bound to go to the warres, but only the vassall. 1761 HUME *Hist. lately serfs, little better than real slaves, have been raised to the ranks of freedom. 1880 'OUIOA' Moths II. 381 You have no serfs now, even in Russia.

b. Used by modern writers with reference to mediæval Europe.

In English Law Latin the terms corresponding to the modern use of serf were nativus (NATIVE sb. 1, NEIF), villanus (VILLEN), and occasionally seruus. The OE. THEOW, and the seruus of Domesday Book, are usually rendered 'slave'.

1. A woollen fabric, the nature of which has probably differed considerably at different periods. Before the 16th c. it is mentioned chiefly as material for hangings, bed-covers, and the like; afterwards it is often referred to as worn by the poorer classes (both men and women), perh. rather on account of its durability than of its price, which seems not to have been extremely low. The name now denotes a very durable twilled cloth of worsted, or with the warp of worsted and the woof of wool, extensively used for clothing and for other purposes.

Sergeant-major. [f. SERGEANT sb. + MAJOR a.; in Fr. sergent-major.] † 1. In the 16-17th c., a military title variously applied to officers widely differing in rank and function: a. A field officer, one in each regiment, next in rank to the lieutenant-colonel, and corresponding partly to the 'major', partly to the 'adjutant', of the modern army.

Ordinarily referred to as superior to the captains, but in many instances a 'captain' is said to be also 'sergeant-major'.

b. Distinguished as grand and petit (or petty) serjeanty.

In their AF. form, these terms occur in the 13th c. According to Britton (c. 1292), grand serjeanty obliges the tenant to a service 'touching the defence of the country', such as acting as marshal, putting an army in the field, or finding a horseman and his equipment for the army, while petit serjeanty binds him to a service 'amounting to half a mark or less', such as carrying to the king a bag, a brooch, an anow, or a bow without string, etc. Later writers give more or less differing accounts: see quots. The Latin of Magna Carta (1215) has occasione parvarum sergantarum (v. t. parva sergantarum). There is no ground for identifying it with mod. L. sericum (prob. merely a use of L. sericum silk) cited by writers of the 18th c. as a name for the flowers of zinc. 4. Oxford University. In certain colleges, one of a class of undergraduate members (no longer existing under that title: see quot. 1852) who received their lodging and most of their board free, and were excused lecture fees.

Originally the servants acted as servants to the fellows, and although the requirement of menial services from them gradually fell into disuse, they continued to be regarded as socially the inferiors of the commoners. The last mention in the Oxford University Calendar of servants as an existing class (at Christ Church) is in 1667; in the following year the same persons are called 'exhibitioners'. In most of the colleges the funds originally used for servants were now used for 'exhibitions', but at Balliol for scholarships. The scholars of Balliol appear in 1507 as 'scholasticis sive servitoribus'.

7. In Civil Law (= L. servitus), and hence in Scots Law: a subjection or subserviency of property either: (1) to some definite person other than its owner ('personal servitude'), or (2) to some definite property other than that of its owner for the benefit of the dominant property ('praedial servitude'). In Scots Law the term is now in practice restricted to praedial servitude, which includes both the 'easement' and the 'profit à prendre' of English Law; it has been sometimes used by English lawyers to include both these kinds of rights.

A personal servitude (of which usufruct is an example) could be constituted either over movables or immovables; a praedial servitude (e.g. a right of way) could only be constituted over land.

b. Sessions of the peace (in ordinary language simply sessions): the periodical sittings of justices of the peace (or, in some instances, of a stipendiary magistrate or a recorder). Often const. as sing.

In England the sessions of the peace are of the following kinds: petty sessions, a court held by two or more justices or a stipendiary magistrate, exercising summary jurisdiction in minor offences within a particular district (a 'petty sessional division' or special sessions, a periodical meeting of the justices of a division prescribed by statute for the transaction of some particular kind of business (under this head are included brewster or licensing sessions for the bearing of applications for licences to sell alcoholic drinks); general or quarter sessions, a court held four times a year (in a county, riding, etc. by the justices of the peace, and in certain boroughs by the recorder), having a limited criminal and civil jurisdiction and certain administrative functions. (The sessions, without qualification, usually denotes the quarter sessions.) Quarter sessions are also held in Scotland and Ireland. In certain British colonies the English system of sessions of the peace formerly existed, and was for a time retained in some of the United States. 1385 CHAUCER Prolog. 355 At sessions there was he lord and sire. 1453 Rolls of Parli. v. 267/2 The Justices of the peace in their Sessions of peace. 1477 Ibid. VI. 173/2 Diverse of the Kyng's Justices of the peas... sitting in the Kyng's general Sessions of peace in the same Countee. 1548 in J. Set (set), v. Forms: see below. Pa. t. and pa. pple. set. [Com. Tent.: OE. settan = OFris. setta (mod. Confusion between set and sit arose as early as the beginning of the 14th c., owing partly to the identity or close similarity of the forms of their past tenses and pa. pples., and partly to the identity of meaning in some uses, as between to be set (= seated) and to sit; cf. Sir v. (etym. note and A. 2 a note). For cases of mere substitution of forms of sit for forms of set, see A. 1 y, 25 below. The spelling sett is still sometimes found in technical senses; cf. [Note.—In the collocations 'Commission of sewers', 'works of sewers', etc., the word had virtually a much wider meaning than sense 1 above; it practically denotes any means of defence against inundation from the sea. The formula enumerating the things placed under the control of the commissioners begins with 'walls' (1322 more fully 'sea-walls', murorum maritimarum) and mentions 'sewers' only in the fifth or sixth place. This had already attracted the attention of lawyers early in the 17th c.; in 1600 Callis (Stat. Sewers, ed. 1647, p. 57) states that 'some compound the word of sea and sewer' (= Wey, defence). Although sense 1 is certainly genuine, and the etymology stated at the head of this article is well established, it seems not impossible that there may have been some early confusion with a native compound of the formation suggested by the writers referred to by Callis. No instance of OE. seawer, however, is known; a (plural) seawere, of obscure meaning, occurs in a 14th c. Worcester Dict. No. 1061. 1522 2d Mannes 1 (1314 in Rolls of Parlt. I. 319/1) appears to mean 'to protect from flood'.

The pseudo-etymological spelling seward (quot. 1623 in 2) is noteworthy. Skinner (Etymol. 1671, s.v.) erroneously attributes to Minshew the statement that the word 'was formerly written seward, perhaps from seaward, either because they [se. sewers] are made towards the sea, or because they ward off the sea!]

b. Shadow of death: a Biblical expression (= LXX and N.T. σκῆπη θανάτου, Vulg. umbra mortis) embodying an ancient interpretation of Heb. מוֹצֵי, traditionally vocalized qalmā'veth, as if f. qāl shadow + māv'veth death.

Ewald and many other scholars, however, think the word should be pronounced qalmūth (or as f. qālmōth = Arab. qalamāth, and that it comes from the Semitic root found in Arab. as qālmā to be dark. However this may be, it is in the Old Testament merely a poetic word for intense darkness (so the margin of the Revised Version, 'deep darkness'). But the phrase 'shadow of death' has (in Eng. as in Christian Latin and other langs.) often been used with various meanings naturally suggested by the words; the commonest use is to denote the gloom and horror of approaching dissolution.

The valley of the shadow of death (Ps. xxiii. 4 in Eng. versions from Coverdale 1535; the earlier versions follow the Vulg. and LXX, which read 'midst' instead of 'valley': often applied to the experience of being brought by illness apparently near to the grave.

same meaning, usually regarded as a specific application of schacht = SHAFT sb. 2, the primitive notion being that of something cylindrical. It is possible, however, that the type shafto*-represented by LG. schacht, Eng. shaft 'pit-hole', may be a separate formation on the Tent. root shat*-of SHAPE v., in its original sense to dig (cf. Gr. σκατρεύω). On either of these views, it is doubtful whether shaft 'pit-hole' goes back to OE. (though not recorded before the 15th c.), or was introduced into England by foreign miners.

Some scholars still adhere to the view of Grimm, that the HG. schacht (and LG. schacht in this sense) represent a Teut. type shafto*-. On this supposition the Eng. word would necessarily be a loan word from the continent. possible, but leaves the ultimate suggested connexion with siologically improbable.]

Shale (ʃeɪl), sb.2 [Perb. a use of SHALE sb.1, or a derivative of SHALE v. (sense 5).]

There is no sufficient reason for the common view that it is a G. schale (= SHALE sb.1), which is not used in this sense (the G. equivalent being schieferthon 'slate clay'); schale
however occurs for a thin layer of ore or stone, and the Deutsches Wbch. has schalstein a laminated limestone, schalgebirge, explained as 'a layer of stone in a stratified range of mountains'.]

Shall (shāl), sb. [f. SHALL v.]

1. An utterance of the word 'shall'; a command, promise, or determination (such as is expressed by means of 'shall').

It is doubtful whether quotes. 1553 and 1603 belong to this word or to SHALE sb. 1. Quots. 1566 and 1593 imply the existence of a punning phrase to feed or serve with shalls (shales).

2. The word 'shall' as idiomatically used in contradiction to 'will'.

The Teut. root (skel*-) : skol* = skul*-to owe (:—pre-Teut. skel*- : skol* = skl*-) is represented by Goth. skula, OHG., OS. scolo, OE. gescol wk. masc., debtor. OHG. sculd, sculda (mod.G. schuld), OS. sculd. OE. scylde fem., debt, guilt. Outside Teut. the only certain cognates are Lith. skelti to be guilty, skilti to get into debt, skolt debt, guilt, OPrussian skallisman (acc.) duty, skellants guilty, po-skulit to admonish.

The northern English dialects (including Sc.) have a form sal, pa. t. suld, with initial s instead of sh. This does not occur in the remains of ONorthumbrian, but first appears in the 13th c. It is remarkable that a similar form, with s irregularly representing OE. sch, existed as a dialectal variant in OHG. (sal, sol, sulun) and OFris. (sal, scl, and sal, scul), and has ousted the regular form in Ger. (sal, sol, and sal, scul). Some scholars regard the s form as representing an OTeut. variant, originating from the euphonic dropping of k in inflexional forms like the subjunctive skli*. It seems more probable that it was independently developed in the different dialects at an early period, while the sk-retained its original pronunciation; in stressless position the k might naturally be dropped, and the simplified initial afterwards extended by analogy to the stressed use.

In Eng. the sh has no inf. or ppl. (the evidence of an OE. inf. sculan, sculan, is doubtful). Some of the other Teut. langs. have an infinitive: OHG. scolan, solan (MHG., mod.G. sollen, MDu. sullen (Du. zullen), ON. skulu pa. t. inf. skylan); Goth. has the pres. ppl. sklandans and the pa. ppl. skland; OHG. has the pres. ppl. scollant (mod.G. sollend), and early mod.G. the pa. ppl. gesollt; ON. has a ppl. adj. skyllt-r bound by duty.]

1. $\frac{1}{2} \times \frac{1}{2} = \frac{1}{4}$

 The past tense should with modal function.

As with other auxiliaries, the pa. t. (orig. subjunctive) of shall is often used to express, not a reference to past time, but a modal qualification of the notion expressed by the present tense. Where in addition the notion of past time is to be expressed, this can often be effected by the use of the perf. instead of the pres. inf. (though sometimes this produces ambiguity); the temporal notion may however be merely contextually implied, and in that case the pa. t. has the appearance of having both functions (temporal and modal) at once.

18. In statements of duty, obligation, or propriety (originally, as applicable to hypothetical conditions not regarded as real).

This conditional form of expression was from an early period substituted for the unconditional shall in sense 2, and in mod. Eng. the pres. tense in this use is obs., and should is ought to.

c. With verbs of liking, preference, etc., should in the first person (and interrogatively in the second) is regarded as more correct than would, though this is often used.

In the third person should is used only in indirect speech (when he represents I); uses like quot. 1852 are abnormal.

The forms I should have liked to (see) and I should like to have (seen) are alternative ways of adding the temporal notion to the modal sense of should. Another form, sometimes met with, but certainly faulty, is I should have liked to have (seen).

Similarly I should think (suppose, etc.) = 'I am inclined to think (suppose, etc.)'; also collog. as a strong affirmation in reply to a tentative suggestion, e.g. 'I should (rather) think he did object'.

a. In dependence on expressions of will, desire, command, advice, request.

Where the verb of the governing clause is in the pa. t., this use is indistinguishable from that treated in 14 d.

The substitution of should for the earlier shall (itself a periphrastic substitute for the more primitive use of the pres. subjunctive: see 12 a) may have arisen from instances in which the governing vb. was in the modal pa. t. (as in quot. c 1200, 1340).

b. When the pres. tense of the principal vb. would be used if the hypothesis were accepted. (Where the pa. t. or the perf. would be used, should is followed by the perf. inf.)

In this use the combination of should with inf. forms a periphrastic past subjunctive: thus 'I should be' = the Sham (xam), sb.1 and a. Also 7 sham(e). [Of obscure origin; the word first appears as slang, together with the related verb, about 1677, and immediately came into very frequent use.

Commonly explained as in some way connected with sham, north. dial. form of SHAME sb. and v. This is not impossible, on the supposition that the 'slang word arose from some once well-known anecdote or incident in a play. The following quot. may possibly contain a genuine tradition, but the alleged origin does not seem to account satisfactorily for the sense in the early examples. (North says that the word was introduced into general use, in the phrase 'sham plot', by Dangerfield; but it was already common some years before 1680, the date to which this statement refers.)

a 1734 NORTH Exam. II. iv. § 1 (1740) 231 The word Sham is true Cant of the Newmarket Breed. It is contracted of ashamed. Drusins Quæst. i. 16), schamaticzare*, f. Jewish Aramaic שְׁמַלְלָה sh'mallā excommunication, whence the denom. v. שְׁמַלְלָה shammēlā to excommunicate.

According to Levy sh'mallā (→ sh'mallā) is a derivative of שְׁמַל, in causative conjugations to destroy, curse. Modern scholars believe the word to have been a general term for excommunication; the statement of Elias Levita that there were three degrees of excommunication, of which sh'mallā was the most severe, appears to be destitute of authority.

trans. In mediæval Judaism: To excommunicate. 1613 PURCHAS Pilgrimage (1614) 113 If they did not amend, they were excommunicated with a greater curse, or Anathema; and if they persisted obstinate, they did Samatize them. 1661 STILLINGF. Treatise i. viii. § 5. 147 A most dreadful sentence of excommunication, whereby they do Schamatize, curse and devote the persons against whom it is pronounced. 1684 tr. Lightfoot's Horæ Hebr. Wks.
